UNDERSTANDING EDITING WITH THE OPTICAL PROFILER Optical Profiler is a useful and powerful tool for getting a quick idea of how your image would look. The image you choose to use with this tool is important. It should be the best version of your photo because there will be no way to go back and edit later. You can open up a RAW file, or use a JPEG. In this example, we used a JPEG. After you load your file, you will see a preview screen similar to the following: Now choose the Preview button to see a quick look at the image (as shown in the following figure). The image has been automatically cropped to just show your image. The optical display shows you the true tonal range of the image. You can also adjust the brightness and contrast settings to your liking. You can use the Display controls to toggle between grid or outline drawing mode and visibility of your adjustment settings. I used the following settings, shown in the following figure: * Image: View: Hold and/or drag the image to be displayed. * Grid: Set this to 2x for a grid of 20 dots. * Pointer Style: Set to Mouse Pointer (Create Workspace). * Adjust Color: Set to Black and White * Adjust Luminance: Set to Black and White. The optical display is the result of setting the Exposure and Contrast to their maximum values, shown in the following figure. You can watch the optical display as you progress, as shown in the following figure. When you are satisfied with the preview, you can export to PNG, JPEG, TIFF, or GIF formats. The Export Controls allow you to save your adjustments to the image, or even to export it to a file. This tool is handy when there are changes that you want to continue to make. I can always come back and make more changes if I need to. USING LAYER-BASED EDITING WITH ADOBE PH

Q: How can I detect git commits outside of my repo? I am working on a project for private use, and it lives on a git repository. I believe that some of the commits made to the repo may have originated from some other repository online, or perhaps were created from someone else's git repository. While much of the code could have been pulled directly from github, some of the commits were made by me - or by others - a long time ago, meaning that I don't know who the author was or where it came from. How can I tell if some of the commits are mine or not? Edit: Assume that the commits are not listed in any public repo that I know about. A: The first thing to do is to get rid of the existing commits you have made and untrack them from the remote repository. Assuming that you own the repository, you can do this in a number of ways: As you initially added each of these branches, you would have been asked what you were adding them for, and you would need to supply a reason, for example, that it is for a tool like CI. So, log in to your repository, and delete all the commits you made, for example: `$ git rm -r --cached commit123` `$ git commit -m 'Haven't checked in for a while'` You can also specify the commit ID or the branch name, for example: `$ git rm -r --cached f1f7e2080ad3505754fd743d0cff9c9895458721` If you don't have write access to the repository you could either ask someone who does to give you write access, or ask a third-party hosting service which offers you write access, for example GitHub, to allow you to recreate those commits. You could then delete the existing commits, add the new ones, and then ask the owner of the repository whether it was OK. If you don't have write access to the repository, or are having difficulty, you could try committing to a newly created branch instead. You can create a branch without leaving any trace of your own commits on the commit history, although this will cause some problems with merging (because you will have made conflicting changes), but it is easier to deal with than removing them. You would create a new branch - `$ git branch new_branch`
