The cost of generating electricity from wind turbines is typically dependent upon a number of factors including (a) the cost of energy and equipment for operating the turbines and (b) the cost of energy and equipment for maintaining the turbine components. To reduce the cost of generating electricity from wind turbines, and thereby increase the efficiency thereof, the output of the wind turbine must be controlled to efficiently match the speed of the turbine. In particular, when the wind turbine is operating at a low ambient wind speed, the output of the turbine is controlled to match the desired rotation speed of the turbine rotor as closely as possible to optimize the operation of the wind turbine. The control of the wind turbine output typically requires the use of a power control apparatus. Such apparatus typically include a relatively complex direct-current control circuit that employs relatively expensive and inefficient components. For example, a large complex bridge rectifier circuit is often used to rectify the alternating-current input from the turbine in order to generate a directcurrent output. As another example, a relatively complicated current sensor circuit is typically employed to measure the current flowing to the rotor. Such a current sensor typically outputs a current signal that is proportional to the turbine current. The complexity of such power control apparatus is often considered to be a drawback that increases manufacturing costs and reduces reliability of the turbine. As an example, the relatively complex direct-current control circuit requires the use of costly, highly integrated and/or of relatively high power consumption semiconductor devices. As an example, a complex integrated circuit is often employed to reduce the number of separate parts.

Accordingly, it is desirable to provide an improved power d0c515b9f4
