A prospective blinded study of radiographs of 35 patients with fracture of the cervical spine, both immediately after halo application and after a week of immobilisation. To compare the effectiveness of spinal flexion and extension at the time of radiographs with results after halo immobilisation. Few studies have used radiography to evaluate the effect of halo immobilisation on the reduction of deformity and range of motion in cervical injury. The signs of flexion/extension under the halo were more effective than the use of extension under the halo (P = 0.008) at reducing hyperflexion and the range of motion in flexion-extension for all patients. However, flexion under the halo and extension under the halo had similar effects on both the range of motion and hyperflexion for patients with fractures classified as types I and II.. Almost all of the men in our study had a father who was a member of a dangerous gang; few had a brother, grandfather, or uncle who was in a dangerous gang, with the possible exception of the one man who had participated in a previous LTCF study. The protective effects of living with one of the men in a study has been documented \[[@B20],[@B21]\], and may account for the fact that the men in our study participated in the study in greater proportion than the men in the Malmquist et al. \[[@B9]\] study, despite the similarity in the ages of the two samples. However, only two of the 23 men who did not participate in the study reported being ineligible due to having a gang member or associate in their household. Thus, the fact that the men who did not participate were similar to the men who did in their stated reasons for ineligibility may suggest that our study's low participation rate was
