Synaptophysin immunoreactivity in the dorsolateral prefrontal cortex predicts response to treatment with fluoxetine in major depression: implications for mood regulation. Dysregulation of mood is implicated in the pathophysiology of depression. Thus, identifying peripheral and central biomarkers for depression provides potential novel targets for antidepressive medication. This study addresses the question whether synaptophysin, a pre-synaptic protein involved in synaptic vesicle release, can be identified as a peripheral biomarker for major depression by examining its concentration in depressed patients before and after an 8-week treatment with the selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor fluoxetine. Synaptophysin immunoreactivity was determined in the dorsolateral prefrontal cortex of depressed patients and healthy controls in a double-blind placebo controlled design. Depressed patients showed a significant reduction in synaptophysin immunoreactivity in response to fluoxetine, whereas no difference was found in healthy controls. Synaptophysin immunoreactivity in the dorsolateral prefrontal cortex can therefore identify major depression and predict treatment response to antidepressants.
