In one of our match analysis sessions, we've put together the best highlights of the game featuring HyperMotion technology. Watch the hypermotion video below to experience a mix of a match and preview of what to expect in Fifa 22 Cracked Version! On May 30, EA Sports' Senior Producer on FIFA, Simon Hollis, gave a quick AMA on Reddit where he talked about the new motion tracking technology and how it's different from previous FIFA titles.  Here is a summary of his most interesting answers  Motion Tracking on the PlayStation 4 controller: Q: The Playstation 4 controller is now capable of detecting every single movement on the field. How is this different than Kinect V2 and what is the advantage of tracking on the controller? A: We are using a new motion tracking system developed specifically for PlayStation 4, so the advantage is that we can track much more fine-grained and specific movement. We can also track a lot of movement that was not possible in previous iterations of FIFA or any other sports games, like crosses, through balls, long passes, set-pieces, etc. Q: How accurate is the tracking data? How much of the movement and game is "real" and how much is generated? A: We are very accurate with the tracking, but unfortunately we can't share that level of detail with you. What we can share is that we have 22 players and trainers in a game, and through our top-level physics we run simulations that allow us to make decisions that players would make in real-life. Q: How can a player experience how well the motion tracking is working? A: When playing the game, we have two different modes. One where you have full control of the player movements, and one where you have limited control. We have found that our players can make decisions and do things in the game that are much more representative of real-life. Q: Can we expect better ratings during gameplay vs. the actual performance? A: I would say it is a lot more representative, but there are a couple of other differences between what we measure during game play and what we report. For example, we need to consider factors like CPU, number of instances, etc. before we are able to report player ratings. At the same time, we measure and report individual player ratings (and performance) in a way that no other game does
